The Dutch ‘Stichting’ – A Useful Tool in International Takeover Defences

Alexander J. Kaarls

Willem J.T. Liedenbaum

Houthoff

A good number of high-profile, cross-border, unsolicited takeover defence battles over the years, including the battles over control of Gucci, Rodamco North America, Arcelor, KPN and Mylan, to name a few, each time featured a Dutch entity with a name that can be hard to pronounce; a “stichting”. What are those stichtings and how did they feature in those defence fights? We believe that the following brief discussion of their features and the manner in which they are used will show both how effective stichtings can be, and that they can still be used much more broadly also in other international situations.

A stichting is a private entity organised under Dutch law. Although often operating on a non-profit basis and for charitable purposes, a stichting may also carry out economic and social activities, and even pure business activities. A stichting can be a shareholder in companies and may develop business activities through subsidiaries. In practice, a stichting is often used as a special purpose vehicle in a variety of contexts, which may be related to corporate governance, anti-takeover protection or estate planning.

Although there was a move among a substantial number of Dutch listed companies some years ago to take down their stichting structures that they had previously put in place for anti-takeover defence purposes, many companies have left their structures in place. Moreover, these takeover defence structures appear to have gained popularity again in recent years, as M&A activity increased, while at the same time popular support appeared to somewhat increase for corporations defending themselves against unsolicited public takeover approaches based on broad stakeholder interest grounds.

Below, we provide a brief description of the main characteristics of the stichting under Dutch law, followed by the most typical structures in which stichtings are used in international transactions for strategic and defensive purposes. By way of further illustration, we also discuss several companies that have an anti-takeover stichting structure in place and, where relevant, Dutch case law relating to these stichting structures.

Main Characteristics of a Stichting

The Dutch stichting is a self-contained legal entity with separate legal personality that has no (and cannot have) members or shareholders. Accordingly, no one “owns” a stichting. The board of directors is the only mandatory corporate body. In general, all powers within the stichting are vested in its board. The stichting is governed and, by default, represented solely by its board. The initial board members are named in the deed of formation. The articles of association (as initially laid down in the deed of formation) govern any subsequent board changes. The authority to appoint and dismiss board members is frequently attributed to the board itself in a system of co-optation. Also, in well-defined circumstances, the board members can be dismissed by a court. The system of co-optation largely insulates the stichting from non-solicited bids (as well as activist shareholder approaches).

A stichting is created solely for the purpose of clearly defined objectives as laid down in its articles of association. As a result of this objective clause, the articles of association provide the context in which the stichting operates. The objectives clause may not contain any provisions that allow payments to be made to the stichting’s founders, except for salary or reimbursements.

The stichting is established through the execution of a notarial deed of formation before a Dutch civil-law notary and must be registered with the trade register at the Dutch Chamber of Commerce. Neither any governmental approval or authorisation, nor the contribution of any capital is required for such establishment. Once established, a stichting can attract funding by way of fundraising, governmental or other subsidies, donations, gifts or otherwise.

In general, the founders and board members of a stichting are not personally liable for debts and other obligations and liabilities of the stichting. This may be different in the event of tortious acts or in the event of bankruptcy as a result of mismanagement.

Certain Typical Defensive Stichting Structures

Stichting preference shares

The articles of association of a publicly traded company may (and many in the Netherlands do) provide for the creation of a separate class of preference shares that can be called (pursuant to a separately entered into call option agreement) at nominal value by an independently managed stichting. It is, in principle, at the discretion of the board of the relevant stichting (which will be set up for that specific purpose; “stichting preference shares”) if and when to exercise the call option. Such stichting preference shares’ sole purpose will be to act in the best interests of the company concerned and its business. When deciding whether to exercise the call option at any time, the stichting board would need to determine that the continuity of the company is threatened and seek to protect such continuity. Such ‘protection of continuity’ would typically refer to a hostile bid situation, but could potentially include other non-solicited activity such as non-solicited stake building (combined with an effort to seek to obtain “creeping control” or the like).

Dutch law requires a resolution of the relevant company’s general meeting of shareholders to issue shares, or to grant the right for a limited period of time to another corporate body (typically, the board of a company) to issue shares. In line therewith, a call option that is granted to a stichting requires approval by the company’s general meeting of shareholders, whereby such a call option is frequently already granted prior to the initial public offering of the relevant company. Preference shares, when issued through exercise of the call option, are typically non-listed, non-transferable and will have equal voting rights to the publicly traded shares. The stichting will only need to pay 25% of the nominal value per preference share, and arrangements to (temporarily) cover such payment from a non-distributable reserve of the company are allowed.

Typically, the mere presence of these stichting/call option structures appears to have a ‘preventive effect’; there have only been a couple of instances in which a stichting actually exercised its call option, whether in the context of a non-solicited bid (KPN (2013) and Mylan (2015)) or in an activist scenario (Stork (2007) and ASMI (2010)). Examples of other corporates that have implemented stichting preference shares structures include Aegon, AholdDelhaize, ASML, Boskalis, DSM, Fugro, ING, Philips, Randstad, SBM Offshore, Vopak, Wolters Kluwer, Signify and TomTom.

In the Stork situation (2007), two activist shareholders of Stork seeking to force Stork to divest its non-core businesses challenged the composition of Stork’s supervisory board. In the ASMI case (2010), activist shareholders pursued the implementation of a new corporate strategy by seeking to change the company’s board. Both the stichting preference shares of Stork and ASMI, respectively, responded by exercising the call option it held, which action, in both cases, was challenged by the activist shareholders concerned before the Enterprise Chamber at the Amsterdam Court of Appeals (a specialised Dutch court for corporate disputes). In the Stork case, the court held that the call option agreement between Stork and the stichting preference shares only permitted the exercise of the call option in case of a hostile bid scenario. Accordingly, the Enterprise Chamber ordered the cancellation of the preference shares. In the ASMI case, the legality of the exercise of the call option could ultimately not be reviewed as the Dutch Supreme Court held that the Enterprise Chamber had no jurisdiction to rule on such legality. In both cases, the parties used the time created by the call option exercises, and subsequent litigation, to get to solutions satisfactory to the respective boards.

In July 2015, Mylan’s stichting preference shares exercised its call option to acquire preference shares, even before Teva formally confirmed its proposed non-solicited USD 40 billion bid for Mylan. As a result, the stichting acquired 50% of the issued capital (and voting rights) in Mylan, and thereby successfully blocked Teva’s bid. A similar situation occurred in 2013, when América Móvil ultimately did not pursue its intended bid for Royal KPN N.V. after the KPN stichting responded to the announced bid by exercising its call option. As both exercised call options were never litigated, the legitimacy of the respective stichting’s actions was never tested, while in both events the non-solicited bidders ultimately did not proceed in making the announced bids.

Through a stichting administrative office structure, one can split the economic ownership of shares from the legal ownership thereof (including the voting rights on the shares). In exchange for the issuance of shares by the company, the independent stichting concerned will issue depository receipts for the underlying shares, which depository receipts (as opposed to the underlying shares) will be admitted to (public) trading. As a result, the legal ownership of the relevant shares will be held by the stichting, but the economic ownership of the shares will be held by the depository receipt holders. All distributions received by the stichting, in its capacity as legal owner of the shares (i.e., shareholder of the relevant company), will typically be passed on directly to the holders of depository receipts, securing tax transparency and economic ownership of the underlying shares with the holders of the depository receipts. However, the stichting’s constitutive documents can, depending on the stichting’s purpose, provide that economic and/or voting rights are completely or completely not, in whole or in part, temporarily or permanently passed on. Furthermore, the holders of depository receipts are granted a power of attorney by the stichting to vote on the underlying shares, which power of attorney can typically only be withheld, limited or revoked in the event of, for example, a non-solicited bid.

The creation of depository receipts for shares in the share capital of a Dutch company is a common phenomenon in Dutch law and practice. In 2015, ABN AMRO put in place a stichting administrative office in the context of its IPO on Euronext Amsterdam. The depository receipts that represented the ordinary shares in ABN AMRO were subsequently listed. The stichting that holds the shares in the capital of ABN AMRO (and issued the depository receipts that are now publicly traded) is entitled to vote the shares itself, at its discretion but in accordance with its stated corporate purpose, if any of a number of specified threats to the continuity of ABN AMRO materialises. In the absence of any such threat, the stichting consistently exercises its voting rights in accordance with the instructions of the relevant holders of depository receipts. For a financial institution like ABN AMRO, this structure (as opposed to, e.g., a preference shares option structure) means that the stichting as existing controlling shareholder has been precleared from an (ECB) regulatory point of view, while it can become “active” at any time when a “threat” actually arises.

Some examples of other Dutch companies that have a similar or different stichting administrative office structure in place include Fugro, KLM, Unilever and Euronext.

Stichting priority shares

Most material company resolutions (e.g. the appointment of board members or the amendment of the articles of association) can be made subject to the prior approval of the meeting of holders of priority shares. The priority shares may be held by an independent stichting, that typically has the objective to serve the best interests of the relevant company and all its stakeholders (including employees, customers, suppliers, etc.). Accordingly, although not a strict anti-takeover device, the implementation of a priority share structure may substantially deter hostile takeover activity, as – in the absence of an agreement with the holder of priority shares – the existence of the priority shares may substantially affect a bidder’s ability to gain full control of the company within a predictable period of time (in particular, where the acquirer would need the stichting for effecting envisaged board changes). When a company that has implemented a stichting priority shares is acquired, the acquirer might not be in a position to secure full control unless it secures support of the stichting’s board, de facto forcing a negotiated offer.

Dutch companies that have a stichting priority shares in place include AkzoNobel, Arcadis and Aalberts Industries. However, priority share structures have lost popularity over the years, as companies have tended to want to show the “openness” of their corporate structures.

Stichting crown jewel

A stichting was put in place in the face of the non-solicited public bid by Mittal Steel N.V. for Arcelor S.A., in early 2006. In this case, the key American asset of Arcelor S.A., the Canadian steel mill Dofasco, was placed in a stichting to ensure that Arcelor S.A. could no longer sell or be forced to sell Dofasco (while full operational control remained with Arcelor S.A.). This structure is often referred to as a “crown jewel lock up”. As a result, Mittal Steel N.V. could no longer seek US antitrust approval on the condition that Dofasco would be sold off following the closing of its non-solicited bid. ArcelorMittal, indeed, ultimately, after negotiating an Arcelor board-supported deal, retained Dofasco and had to dispose of other American production assets that it already owned itself. The stichting structure was later unwound by the stichting board (in line with the stichting’s own constitutive documents), when the hostile threat no longer existed.

Dutch criteria for protective measures

A stichting structure may, without restriction (and without realistic risk of challenge), be structured as an anti-takeover and protective device (including the exercise of a call option or issuing depositary receipts, as described above). However, when it involves a Dutch (listed) corporate, protective measures can be reviewed and, where appropriate, neutralised by the Enterprise Chamber upon the request of one or more shareholders who hold a sufficient amount of shares to have standing.

The criteria set out by the Dutch Supreme Court in its RNA case are considered to be the basis for the Enterprise Chamber to assess the permissibility of protective measures when so invoked. In short, the Enterprise Chamber must take into consideration all “relevant circumstances of the case”. The Enterprise Chamber would in particular need to assess whether the management board could reasonably have come to the conclusion that invoking the protective measure was necessary to maintain a status quo, allowing the board to enter into discussions with the stakeholders involved without any changes being made to the composition of the board or to the strategy of the company (to the extent that the board would deem such changes to not be in the best interest of the company or its stakeholders). The relevant standard to assess whether invoking a protective measure is justified is whether that measure, under the given circumstances and applying a reasonable assessment of the interests of the stakeholders involved (i.e. not only the company’s shareholders, but all stakeholders, including the company’s employees, customers and suppliers), is an adequate and proportional response to the imminent threat(s).

Conclusion

The popularity of the type of stichting structures described above has varied within the Netherlands over the years. Currently, they appear to be gaining in popularity again. Although we believe it key that stichting boards, in their assessments and decision-making, truly and properly consider all stakeholder interests (so, including where appropriate those of shareholders), we continue to see these structures as uniquely strong from an international perspective. Moreover, we see a broad range of situations in which stichting structures can be successfully applied internationally, including non-takeover defence situations.
